With Kimberly Barthel BMR OTR.

PRESENTER:

Kimberly Barthel BMR, OTR

Is a pediatric mental health expert and a neurobiologist who brilliantly blends and bridges the connection between the science of trauma and attachment and the intuitive aspects of the therapeutic process.

“What we now know about attachment, developmental trauma and the brain is changing the essence of therapeutic practice.”

-Kimberly Barthel,
BMR, OTR

September 13 & 14, 2010

Norwood Hotel in St Boniface

112 Marion Street, Winnipeg, MB R2H 0T1

Neurodevelopmental research has established that, because of the brain's extreme malleability and sensitivity to experience in early childhood, traumatic events in the first few years of life have long-term impacts on emotional, behavioral, cognitive, social and physiological functioning. This is particularly likely if the events are severe, unpredictable, or persistent (Perry, 1994). This workshop will introduce the neurobiological effects of early developmental trauma upon the brain and resultant behavior. Methods for effectively working with children and adults who have suffered from ongoing, recent and past neurodevelopmental trauma will be discussed. The power of attachment as intervention will be examined.
