Neurodevelopmental research has established that, because of the brain's extreme malleability and sensitivity to experience in early childhood, traumatic events in the first few years of life have long-term impacts on emotional, behavioral, cognitive, social and physiological functioning. This is particularly likely if the events are severe, unpredictable, or persistent (Perry, 1994). This workshop will introduce the neurobiological effects of early developmental trauma upon the brain and resultant behavior. Methods for effectively working with children and adults who have suffered from ongoing, recent and past neurodevelopmental trauma will be discussed.

The goal of this workshop is to give counselors, therapists, social service and mental health care providers an understanding of trauma from an attachment perspective and to introduce effective interventions that incorporate the body, the mind and the emotions. This information will be of interest to anyone working with children, adolescents, adults and families.

Day 1: The Neurobiology of Trauma

This day will focus on developing an understanding of trauma, brain development and the implications for brain function caused by trauma.

Presented by: Kim Barthel, BMR OTR

Day 2 am: Body Based Trauma Interventions

The focus of this morning will be on developing a repertoire of interventions that work through the body to help individuals overcome the effects of trauma.

Presented by Kim Barthel, BMR OTR

Day 2 pm: Interventions for working with Ongoing Trauma

This afternoon will focus on developing strategies for working with individuals who continue to be exposed to ongoing trauma.

Presented by: Irmie Nickel, BOT MA, OT Reg (MB)

Day 3: Working through Recent and Past Trauma

This morning will focus on developing an understanding of strategies for working through recent trauma. Interventions for working through past trauma will be explored in the afternoon.

Presented by: Irmie Nickel, BOT MA, OT Reg (MB)
